THREE UNDER 35 COALITION

DC Mayoral Candidate Questionnaire

Candidate Responses Organized by Question

2024 Primary Cycle

Three Under 35 (3U35) is a coalition of organizations and directly impacted individuals working to end the cycle (damaging, generational cycle) of youth incarceration in the District of Columbia. We are committed to ensuring that the District's youth justice system is rooted in racial equity, trauma-informed practices, and the principles of restorative justice. We are also committed to ensuring that the District's youth justice system is grounded in the lived experiences of those who have been most impacted by the harsh implementation and, and examples of the dehumanization of the Office of Emerging Adult Services. Our coalition is made up of organizations and individuals who have been directly impacted by the District's youth justice system, and we are committed to ensuring that the District's youth justice system is grounded in the lived experiences of those who have been most impacted by the harsh implementation and, and examples of the dehumanization of the Office of Emerging Adult Services.

As DC prepares to elect new leadership, 3U35 invited mayoral candidates to share their vision for youth justice reform, including their commitment to ending youth incarceration, and their plans to support young people and their families if elected.

Answer Included	Answer Not Available
Early Questionnaire	Unsent Outreach

Question 1

What makes you want to serve the people of DC as our next mayor?

Kenyan McDuffie

I was elected by my voters to dedicate my time to improving our schools, public safety, economic opportunity, and building pathways to the middle class. I've been dedicated to that work for the past 12 years and I'm proud to say that it's been successful. I'm ...

Kenyan McDuffie

I'll ramp up communities and small businesses to ensure that they can thrive and grow. I'll work to lower taxes, and to support a robust and diverse economy that creates jobs for residents of all skill levels and backgrounds. I'll continue to invest in our schools, and I'll work to ensure that our children are receiving a high-quality education that prepares them for success in college and in their careers. I'll continue to improve our public safety ecosystem, with housing and childcare more affordable and accessible for families. I'll work to ensure that our children and families have access to the services they need to be healthy and successful. I'll be a champion for Ward 7 and 8 in my role as Mayor. I'll work to ensure that our residents are dedicated, high-quality, home-based childcare providers who are supported and compensated at a level that reflects the value they provide to our children and families. I'll work to support senior technical education offerings in DC Public Schools and DC Public Charter Schools, and to ensure that our students are prepared for good-paying jobs. I'll work to ensure that our residents have access to affordable, high-quality, home-based childcare providers who are supported and compensated at a level that reflects the value they provide to our children and families. I'll work to support senior technical education offerings in DC Public Schools and DC Public Charter Schools, and to ensure that our students are prepared for good-paying jobs. I'll work to make s

Kenyan McDuffie

Restricting a person's ability to provide for themselves and their family is cruel. While, the argument is that this is to prevent recidivism, the reality is that it hurts it and both ends it. Full participation in civic and economic life is the best way to prevent crime. The hard-working people who are trying to turn their lives around deserve the opportunity to provide for their families. Because they are prevented from doing so, they are more likely to return to crime. Likewise, I also authored the Fair Credit Reform Act to help ensure that people are not denied access to financial services because of their criminal history. Unfortunately, the Republican majority in the House of Representatives has chosen to weaponize their power against working families. Instead of working to lower costs, they have chosen to use their power to score political points. Republicans have voted to repeal the Fair Credit Reform Act, to roll back the Credit Card Accountability Responsibility and Disclosure Act, to repeal the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau's authority to supervise nonbank companies that pose risks to consumers, and to repeal the Dodd-Frank Act's Durbin Amendment, which has helped to lower the cost of debit card transactions for small businesses. Republicans have also voted to repeal the Affordable Care Act, which has helped millions of Americans get access to affordable health care. Republicans have voted to repeal the Affordable Care Act more than 50 times, and they have voted to repeal the Durbin Amendment more than 10 times. Republicans have also voted to repeal the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau's authority to supervise nonbank companies that pose risks to consumers more than 10 times. Republicans have voted to repeal the Dodd-Frank Act more than 30 times. Republicans have voted to repeal the Fair Credit Reform Act more than 5 times. Republicans have voted to repeal the Credit Card Accountability Responsibility and Disclosure Act more than 5 times. Republicans have

Vincent Orange

Support carefully structured expansion with judicial review.

Jamesse Lewis George

Yes, I do. If an individual has demonstrated rehabilitation, and met the factors set forth in the law, all individuals should have the opportunity to petition for a sentence to be reduced and look back. We know that longer sentences do not improve public safety and can have the opposite effect.

Question 15

Current law creates a rebuttable presumption for pretrial detention, but recent legislation has significantly increased the burden of proof. What is your position on pretrial release for people who are presumed innocent?

Gary Goodweather

I support a pretrial system that defaults to release with appropriate conditions. Risk assessment should be individualized, evidence-based, and focused on flight risk and genuine public safety concerns, not on the severity of the charge alone. Charge-based presumptions sweep too broadly—a standard charge with a serious offense is not automatically dangerous, and a person should not be detained simply because a prosecutor can persuade a bench-cuse that treats an accusation as evidence of danger. The data does not support the expansion DC has pursued. Research from the Council for Court Excellence found that the majority of people released pretrial who had been charged with violent crimes remained arrest-free throughout their pretrial release period. That is not a system that justifies locking more people up before trial. It is a number that suggests our pretrial conditions supervision was already working for the vast majority of cases. Yet the jail population has grown substantially even as crime has fallen. That means we are incarcerating more people who are not a threat to anyone in the community. It is expensive, it is unnecessary, and it is unjust to the people who have not been found guilty. The conditions inside CDF are those described earlier in this questionnaire apply to every person held pretrial. They are experiencing the assaults, the contraband food, the behavioral health vacancies, and the overdoses. When genuine public safety concerns exist, courts should be able to impose meaningful conditions: supervision, GPS monitoring, check-ins, curfews, or other measures tailored to the individual risk—also want to be direct about what pretrial detention costs the city. Every person held pretrial costs roughly a bed in a facility that is already over capacity. They may lose their job, their housing, and their connection to family while awaiting trial. That instability follows them regardless of whether they are ultimately convicted, and it makes a real difference in outcomes and for the community. The direction of recent legislation has been to expand detention, and the results have not made us safer.

Vincent Orange

Support release with risk-based conditions; detention only when necessary for safety.

Jamesse Lewis George

As a former prosecutor, I've seen firsthand how pretrial decisions impact both community safety, access to critical services, and an individual's stability. I strongly believe our system should start from the least restrictive environment, and that release should be consistent with public safety. I do not support changes that would broaden the use of pretrial detention and I do not support changes to the pretrial detention standard, because we should only deprive someone of their liberty when there is no alternative. The research shows that even one day of incarceration can cause long-term harm and make us less safe. Although my position did not change, I did support legislation that made two of those changes to the Bail Act specifically, to address violent and shocking outcomes in DC. Courts should continue to weigh public safety and individual circumstances, with a preference for community-based placements and appropriate conditions that support stability and ensure people can return to court.

Kenyan McDuffie

Every person who stands accused is presumed innocent. That presumption is the constitutional foundation on which the entire system is supposed to rest. Current DC law creates several rebuttable presumptions that, in practice, function more like irrebuttable presumptions: specific circumstances, not a universal presumption of detention. Jayneidene, W., Kumbakaeles, C., Jones, A., & McDaniel, J. (2018). Work Stress and Psychiatric Outcomes Among Correctional Officers in the USA. Psychoactives, 35, 65–77.https://doi.org/10.3390/psychoactives3010005 See also https://news.berkeley.edu/2011/08/02/ca-california-correctional-officers-study/ Bail reform is complicated and—and—subtle—even—fairly—and—helpful—being precise about that distinction matters because the conditions themselves can burden clothing we read. Courts should have full discretion, grounded in the fullest possible information about an individual, to make bond decisions tailored to two constitutionally required purposes: the safety of any person in the community and the person's return to court. That calibration cannot happen when rigid statutory presumptions displace individualized judgment. When a judge is required to presume detention, or when the legislature has dramatically shifted the burden of proof, the court loses the flexibility to arrive at the least restrictive condition that actually meets those purposes. Secure the Bail Amendment Act would restore balance by facially disposes insect of our pretrial system starts at this stage. Racial bias and prior contact with the criminal legal system, which is itself shaped by enforcement decisions, affect who is deemed dangerous and who is detained. Expanding presumptions of detention amplifies that disparity. I stood against the DNA collection provisions in Secure DC when almost no one else would, because the presumption of innocence means more than lip service. My position is that we should revisit the presumptions added under Initiative 83 and return to a framework that gives courts genuine, individualized discretion.

Question 16

Will you push the US Bureau of Prisons to construct a halfway house in DC?

Vincent Orange

Yes, essential for successful reentry.

Jamesse Lewis George

The current system is failing DC residents. Too many people are sent far from home while incarcerated and then released back into our city with little support. That undermines efforts to reconnect with family, access services, and successfully return to their communities. I believe DC residents should have the option to return home and complete their transition in the District. But we have to be clear: this is a federal issue and the failure of places like Hope Village.

If we are going to have reentry facilities in DC, they must be safe, well-run, and focused on stability and success. That means adequate staffing, well-trained staff, access to mental health care, education opportunities, job placement, and transportation, and clear accountability for conditions inside those facilities.

Kenyan McDuffie

My administration will push the Bureau of Prisons to build with that model in mind, and we will insist that any new infrastructure be designed with the future in mind. As DC continues to decarcerate, these facilities should be repurposable, built to transition into affordable housing, community health centers, or other neighborhood assets rather than becoming abandoned investments. Smart reentry infrastructure is also smart city planning, and I will fight for both.

Gary Goodweather

DC on Banning Road, is over five years behind schedule and still not open. As of November, 212 residents convicted of DC code offenses who are transitioning out of incarceration are being sent to a halfway house in Baltimore. A person coming home to DC after years in a federal facility is spending the most critical months of their reentry in another city, separated from the family connections, community ties, and local services that determine whether reentry succeeds or fails. I also want to emphasize that a single halfway house is not sufficient for a city where roughly 1,200 people return from federal custody every year. DC needs a continuum of transitional housing options, including secure facilities for returning citizens, community-based transitional housing, and permanent supportive housing with reentry services, and the dedicated HTF set-aside for returning citizens housing I committed to earlier in this questionnaire. A halfway house is one piece

Question 17

Are you confident in the leadership of the Department of Corrections and the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services? Would you keep or replace the current directors, Tom Faust (DOC) and Sam Abed (DYRS)?

Jamesse Lewis George

I am not confident in the current outcomes we are seeing from DOC and DYRS, particularly when it comes to safety, conditions, and trust. The director is the responsible for appointing leadership, and I will be looking for leaders who can bring real urgency to delivering safe, accountable, and rehabilitative systems.

At the same time, these challenges are not just about one person. We are seeing systemic issues around culture, accountability, and priorities that need to be addressed. That's why I will conduct a comprehensive audit of both agencies and set clear expectations for leadership moving forward, and then I will make a decision about the best leadership moving forward.

I expect that leadership changes will be part of that process, but my focus is on ensuring these agencies are delivering the outcomes residents deserve.

Kenyan McDuffie

As the former chair of the committee on public safety and judiciary, I have deep respect for the public servants leading these agencies and for the incredibly difficult work they do every day. DOC and DYRS are each responsible for hundreds of lives, millions of dollars in taxes, and everyone in between. I am confident in the some of the latter, but not successfully so in our communities. That said, no standard which is simple but worth reiterating and applying for this question: are we delivering safe, humane, and rehabilitative and better outcomes for residents? We've seen real challenges in DOC's operations, and I have real questions about programming. I The Council for Court Excellence and the Jails and Justice Task Force's staffing, and consistency of care, these issues need to be addressed with urgency, transparency. I would not make a blanket commitment today to retain or replace any individual. Similar to DMPED, I would conduct a thorough performance review of both agencies' leadership teams, with a clear mandate to ensure safety, rehabilitation, and staffing stability, and rehabilitation outcomes. In addition to receiving applicants from jurisdictions with successful measurable outcomes, I would nonetheless remain open to continuity if current leadership is meeting those expectations and demonstrating a plan to improve. If not, however, I will make changes to ensure we have leaders in place who can deliver the results our residents, including our young people, deserve.

Gary Goodweather

I am not confident in the current trajectory of either agency for the same reasons I have referenced throughout this questionnaire. If the people currently leading them could have fixed these problems, they would have—and not be this series after years under their leadership. Both directors should be replaced, and that my administration will evaluate them against a standard of performance.

Vincent Orange

Evaluate performance; retain or replace based on results and accountability.

Question 18

What is your position on involving people with lived experience in the criminal legal system—both as employees and as contractors—in the design and delivery of direct-service programs, and in decision-making? Reentry services are offered across the budget is allocated? Do you support funding for an Office of Emerging Adult Services?

Kenyan McDuffie

People with lived experience in the criminal legal system are a primary resource, not a supplementary one. Their involvement as mentors and credible messengers in direct-service programs is well-documented as effective, but the conversation about their role too often stops there. What is equally important and far less common is their role in research and policymaking. The people who have lived through these systems can see what's working and its failures, and to ensure policies in ways that no external analysis can fully replicate. Any serious reform effort that moves from design and decision-making will produce policy that misses the mark. On budget allocation and service delivery, people who have navigated reentry know which services are meaningful and which are performative. They know where the gaps are. An advisory structure that gives returning residents genuine, ongoing influence over how reentry dollars are spent, rather than consultative input alone, will produce better outcomes than one designed by administrators who have never experienced it from the inside. I fully support funding for an Office of Emerging Adult Services. The emerging adult population—roughly ages 18 to 24—has a set of risk and service characteristics that neither youth-serving systems nor adult systems address well. OEAS would create dedicated infrastructure to serve that population with programming that reflects their specific developmental needs. Before its closure, the Justice Policy Institute completed an emerging adults plan under the Youth Rehabilitation Act, and that work should serve as an implementation guide as we stand up this office. We should focus on what has already been done and that investment is available.

Gary Goodweather

People with lived experience in the criminal legal system are a primary resource, not a supplementary one. Their involvement as mentors and credible messengers in direct-service programs is well-documented as effective, but the conversation about their role too often stops there. What is equally important and far less common is their role in research and policymaking. The people who have lived through these systems can see what's working and its failures, and to ensure policies in ways that no external analysis can fully replicate. Any serious reform effort that moves from design and decision-making will produce policy that misses the mark. On budget allocation and service delivery, people who have navigated reentry know which services are meaningful and which are performative. They know where the gaps are. An advisory structure that gives returning residents genuine, ongoing influence over how reentry dollars are spent, rather than consultative input alone, will produce better outcomes than one designed by administrators who have never experienced it from the inside. I fully support funding for an Office of Emerging Adult Services. The emerging adult population—roughly ages 18 to 24—has a set of risk and service characteristics that neither youth-serving systems nor adult systems address well. OEAS would create dedicated infrastructure to serve that population with programming that reflects their specific developmental needs. Before its closure, the Justice Policy Institute completed an emerging adults plan under the Youth Rehabilitation Act, and that work should serve as an implementation guide as we stand up this office. We should focus on what has already been done and that investment is available.

Vincent Orange

Strongly support. Lived experience must inform policy. Support OEAS funding.

Jamesse Lewis George

Individuals with lived experience should be contributing to the solution and will only improve public safety through our city. These individuals should be involved in legislative change, programmatic expansion, and in the identification of problems and corresponding solutions. I strongly support the inclusion of people with lived experience in my government and will commit to finding employment opportunities and pathways to engage with government.

Young people—emerging adults–between the ages of 18 and 25 make up a disproportionate amount of crime in DC and also have needs unique to that of other populations. There must be an intentional focus on ensuring that their needs are met across all sectors, this will require coordination and planning. Given that, I strongly support the funding of an Office of Emerging Adult Services.

Question 19

Would you support a budget allocation for transitional housing or residential programming for court-involved emerging adults?

Gary Goodweather

Would you support a budget allocation for transitional housing or residential programming for court-involved emerging adults? Yes. Housing is the single most urgent barrier to successful reentry, and it is even more acute for emerging adults who often have no independent housing history, no credit, and no savings to draw on. A person coming out of incarceration at 22 or 23 with nowhere to live is being set up to fail.

Jamesse Lewis George

Yes. Housing is a critical need and too often I hear that there is not available housing for justice impacted individuals. Further, there must be transitional housing options for emerging adults, these options must be fully staffed and developed to meet the unique needs of this population so that they can transition into independent adulthood.

Vincent Orange

Yes, critical for stability and reducing recidivism.

Kenyan McDuffie

We also need to address the crisis bed shortage directly. DC currently has only 16 crisis stabilization beds citywide, provided through Crossing Place and Jordan House and located at the emergency facility on the grounds of the old DC General Hospital. These beds serve adults experiencing psychiatric or emotional crises as an alternative to inpatient psychiatric hospitalization, available for days of up to 14 days. They are accessible through the Access Helpline (1-888-793-4357) or by walking in. Expanding crisis bed capacity is not ambitious one unwilling to come in. The Comprehensive Psychiatric Emergency Program operates 24 hours a day as an additional layer of support. Sixteen beds for a city of 700,000 people is a serious gap, and court-involved emerging adults disproportionately need this level of support. My administration will fund expanded crisis bed capacity alongside dedicated transitional housing for this population.

Question 20

How will your administration measure success in youth safety and held agencies accountable?

Vincent Orange

Track violence reduction, youth engagement, recidivism, and employment outcomes; audits; reporting and agency accountability.

End of Document

Jamesse Lewis George

Holding agencies accountable is a cornerstone of my campaign. For too long the District has been labeled as resource rich and coordination poor. The administration has poorly managed funding and obsolete programs remain on the books while programs that residents need are lacking. As a people first Mayor, I will measure success by whether we are fully fund and fulfill that all for young people and families are safe, healthy, and supported rather than violence, however, and also whether students are truly truancy and we must have safe, and productive, spaces for young people to learn and develop. Youth safety will be measured by number of young people accessing positive, pro-social services, declining rates of youth violence and youth victims, and rates of youth engagement in education.

Kenyan McDuffie

My administration will track youth safety outcomes through a citywide performance dashboard that publishes real-time service delivery data across agencies, visible to residents, advocates, and policymakers alike. The metrics I will publicly report include: housing stability and placement rates for court-involved youth; school enrollment and attendance; connection to workforce training or employment; access to behavioral health services; and intervals between contact with the legal system. Rearrest rates are a blunt instrument and I will supplement them with more nuanced measures of behavioral change, including reductions in the severity of any subsequent legal contact. Agencies including DYRS, DBH, and DOES will be held accountable through these dashboards, with annual public reviews and direct reporting lines to my office.

Gary Goodweather

The same way I will measure success across every area of city government: transparent data, public reporting, and consequences when agencies fail to deliver.

For youth safety specifically, my administration will track and publish these categories of data quarterly:

Outcomes for young people in government custody: assaults, use of force incidents, average daily population versus capacity, psychotropic medication rates, and behavioral health service access at DYRS facilities. Independent oversight of juvenile facilities will be restored and funded. The decision to defund that office was a step backward and I will reverse it.

Outcomes for young people in the community: youth employment and enrollment rates, participation in violence interruption and mentorship programs, and contact with the criminal legal system disaggregated by ward, age, and race.

Reentry outcomes for emerging adults: housing placement, employment connection, program completion, and recidivism rates for the 18 to 25 population, tracked through MOR2A and coordinated with the Office of Emerging Adult Services.

All of this will be published on a public dashboard. Agency heads will be evaluated against these metrics in regular performance reviews reported to the Mayor's office. When the outcomes show a program is working, we scale it. When they show an agency is failing the young people it is responsible for, it is responsible for leadership changes.

My service and career have been built on setting goals, measuring results, and being held accountable for what I deliver. That is what I will bring to youth safety in DC.